Now, with Lightroom 5, you can import a single image as an album, and select "Import as Catalog." This is pretty neat, as more companies are using RAW files for multiple purposes and not just as media to be transferred from place to place. If you are using a photo printer, a local scanner, and a standalone PC for editing photos, then having the option to make a single image imported into the software and organized as a full-on album is a great thing. The other way that Lightroom 5 changes the importing process is by adding the option to import a picture directly into a projects in the main window. This requires that you select it as an existing project, of course, but it is a much tidier way of dealing with the importing process. It will make sure that you get the photo into your main project, and it will create the project album for you from there on out. I would understand it if Lightroom 5 made some changes in the organizational process that other software made no changes to because other software tends to do what it does well, whereas Lightroom needs to be smarter. Overall, Lightroom 5 does not feel substantially different from Lightroom 4 other than the addition of some advanced features. The only drawback is that the speed of image processing can be slow if you have a lot of images. It also doesn't help that some issues that occurred in Lightroom 4 have yet to be addressed. I tried to downplay this by saying that Lightroom 4 is still very popular, but even I myself as an avid photographer would likely prefer a newer version of Lightroom, which is also more intuitive. After all, it wouldn't matter much if Lightroom 5 was the most sophisticated image editing and RAW converter tool on Earth. Still, there are issues with image processing speed.
