Photoshop is a photo editing staple for a reason. It is easy-to-use, versatile, and comes with powerful tools that allow designers to turn their ideas into fantastically rendered works. But not all of us can be as fast and savvy with a graphics program as we are with a design tool. Photoshop is a very long way behind in the collaborative space of design. It has no real equivalents to Sketch or Illustrator, and lacks easy-to-use version controls for color. It also doesn't have the same support from global color leaders Pantone, as Pantone's inclusion in the software only began with CS6. In addition, Adobe doesn't have the same level of confidence in the software's own colors; the RGB, CMYK, and HSB color systems are very much convoluted in Photoshop compared to alternatives, such as Pantone's paint management system. If you don't want a logo in your game, do you really want it in your website? I understand that you probably don't want logos to appear on the map of your game, but why not include them on the website? All the same, I just can't embed the Soundcloud website in my website, and the last thing I wanted to do was to leave the website and head to Soundcloud to listen to the most amazing music and see what is there. That's why I prefer Soundcloud's website. But what if Soundcloud wasn't able to list and embed the Soundcloud website into your website? That would be a real pain. I do hope that we can work together.
