I have tried using length, but it returns a different number than I need. I'm trying to figure out if there is a way to convert that into a percentage of how many that element is compared to the total number of elements. A: There are several ways to do it, one of the easiest is the following: Since a number (and not an array) is stored in an array, the number is stored in the first (0) index. Thus, you can get the number of elements in an array simply by getting the length of the array: var myArr = [1,3,5,9,7,11,5,2]; alert(myArr.length); The number of elements is equal to the length of the array. When you iterate over the array, you're effectively iterating over the elements. So, if you do this: for (var i = 0; i < myArr.length; i++) { alert(i); } You will notice that the values of i will be incremented by 1 for each iteration. This just shows that myArr.length contains the length of the array. If you want to know the number of elements of an array in a percentage: var myArr = [1,3,5,9,7,11,5,2]; for (var i = 0; i < myArr.length; i++) { var result = (myArr.length / myArr[0]) * 100; alert(
